AI Overview

Fiber optic heat shrink tubing is available in various sizes, materials, and customizable options, with suppliers offering competitive pricing and global delivery. Product Overview Fiber optic heat shrink tubing, also known as fiber splice tubes, fusion protection tubes, or splice protection tubes, is designed to protect and secure optical fibers, ensuring mechanical strength and maintaining optical transmission performance. Common materials include cross-linked polyolefin, nylon, and hot fusion tubing, often reinforced with a stainless steel or quartz rod for added durability. These tubes provide moisture resistance, flame retardancy, and environmental protection, making them suitable for harsh telecommunications environments. Sizes and Specifications Standard diameters: 1 mm, 2 mm, 3 mm, or customizable to match fiber jacket sizes. Length: Typically 2 meters (7 ft) or cut-to-length options available. Shrink ratio: Commonly 2:1, allowing the tubing to contract and tightly seal the fiber splice. Color options: Customizable for easy identification and installation. Compatibility: Available for single fiber and ribbon fiber splicing. Features Flame retardant and environmentally friendly. Low shrink temperature with rapid contraction. Clear sleeves for easy splice inspection before shrinkage. Sealing structure ensures reliable splicing under varying temperature and humidity conditions. Easy installation to prevent fiber damage. Customization and Compliance Suppliers offer custom designs, lengths, diameters, and logos for bulk orders. Many products comply with RoHS and REACH regulations, restricting hazardous substances and ensuring environmental safety. Quotation and Ordering Fiber in the box provides competitive pricing and worldwide delivery for standard and customized heat shrink tubes. FS.com offers 2-meter tubes with certification details and compliance with EU RoHS standards. Bonelinks and LX Telecom provide customizable options for single and ribbon fibers, including reinfor...
